

JOSEPH D. McNAMARA

Research Fellow

Expertise: Criminal justice, police technology and management systems, crime prevention, international drug control policies

A Hoover fellow since 1991, Joseph McNamara had previously served as chief of police of the city of San Jose, California, for fifteen years. Earlier positions include police chief of Kansas City, Missouri, and director of crime analysis for the New York City Police Department. The holder of a doctorate in public administration from Harvard University and a former criminal justice research fellow at Harvard Law School, he has lectured at a number of colleges and universities, including Stanford, Harvard, and the University of California, Berkeley. He has also served as a commentator on numerous television and radio broadcasts. He has written five books, including three detective novels and a crime prevention text. He has also published articles in leading newspapers throughout the country. He is a member of the Board of Directors of the Drug Policy Alliance.